Riding with Balloons

When did man first cross the channel between England and France by air? If you ask somebody that question, he will probably answer, '1909'. Or he will mention the name of Louis Bleriot who flew a small plane across from France to England that year.

In fact the correct answer is 1785. That was the year in which a balloon carried a man across the channel for the first time. Balloons were making long journeys in the air a hundred years before the first aero plane left the ground.

Leonardo da Vinci was already thinking about flying machines in about 1500. But he didn't think of balloons. His machines had wings or propellers or both. None of them ever got off the ground. Leonardo understood the reason for this: he did not have enough power. Man was not strong enough to lift machines up in the air and keep them there.

Where was the power to come from? Nearly 300 years later, the Montgolfier brothers also wanted to build a machine that would take man up into the air. Like Leonardo and others before them, they had thought about wings and a machine that could fly like a bird. And then they thought about a balloon.

"Hot air always rises" they reasoned. "If we can fill a bag with hot air, the bag will rise. A very large bag could even lift a man – perhaps.". The two brothers were the sons of a paper maker at Annonay in southern France; it was not very difficult for them to make a large bag of paper and cloth. A crowd gathered at Annonay to watch them when they held the bag over a hot fire. The bag filled with smoke and hot air, and they felt it pulling upwards. After some time they let the bag go. The bag rose quickly into the air. The first balloon flight had been made. The Montgolfier brothers did not go up with their balloon. They were inventors not airmen. At the same time another man was sure that a balloon filled with the gas Hydrogen (H) must rise into the air. This was J.A.C. Charles, the great French scientist and expert on gases. Only two months after the Montgolfier's success Charles' hydrogen balloon rose from a Paris square. The flight was a great success. The balloon rose so high and went too far that the crowd was unable to see it. It came down nearly half an hour later, in a village outside Paris. But the villagers flying animal, and they 'killed' it.

In October 1783, the Montgolfier brothers sent up their second hot-air balloon. This time they chose Paris as the place. A great crowd came to watch. Again the brothers stayed on the ground, but their balloon lifted a man named De Rozier about 25 meters on the air. In November, De Rozier made a 25 minutes flight across parts. Now various balloonists made longer and longer flights. The channel was crossed in 1785. The aeroplane and not the balloon, has become man's real flying machine.

But a lot of people still go up in balloons. They do it for pleasure, especially in the United States and Europe. There are often balloon races, and balloonists sometimes travel hundreds of miles before they come down. The race may be over mountains like the Alps in Switzerland, and then the balloons may go up the height of 6,000 meters or more. Balloonists love these flights because of the fresh air, the silence, the wonderful news, and the sense of freedom. It is not always easy to make the balloon come down in the chosen place. Balloonists have landed in cold lakes, on top of high mountains, and even among the lions in a park. But they are not always helpless. They can choose between different winds at different heights.

The longest balloon flight on record is 3,042 kilometers. But at some time in the future somebody will make a balloon flight across the Atlantic. Could it be you?

Questions
