Section Three: Reading Passage I

Immigration

1 Migration takes many forms. People migrate as manual workers, highly qualified specialists, entrepreneurs, refugees or as family members of previous migrants. Whether the initial intention is temporary or permanent movement, many migrants become settlers. Migration has been part of human history from the earliest times, but it has grown in volume and significance, and may be one of the most important factors in global change.

2017 English 2nd Round Entrance Exam

2 No single cause can explain why people choose to leave their country and settle in another. It is hardly ever a simple individual action, in which a person decides to move in search of a better life, leaves the home country and quickly becomes assimilated into the new country. Much more often, the process of migration and settlement stretches over a long period, affecting the rest of the migrant's life and also later generations. It is a collective action, caused by social change and affecting the whole society of both countries.

3 While some theories about migration emphasize individual choice, and others focus on the influence of governments and business, it is more realistic to understand migration in terms of a complex interaction among all these elements. Large-scale institutional factors, such as international relations, political economy and government policies, play a part in any decision to emigrate, as do the informal social networks, practices, and beliefs of the migrants themselves.

4 Migration generally arises from the existence of previous links between home and new countries, based on colonization, political influence, trade, investment or cultural ties. For instance, migration from some North and West African countries to France is linked to earlier French colonization, leaving French as a major language of the countries concerned.

5 Typically, migration is started by an external factor, such as a shortage of labor in the new country. Once the initial movement is by young people, usually men. Once a path has been established, relatives and friends follow, and are assisted by those already there. Social networks based on family or a common place of origin help to provide housing, work, assistance in coping with bureaucratic procedures and support in personal difficulties. These social networks make the process of migration safer and more manageable for the migrants and their families.

6 Migrant groups develop their own social and economic infrastructure: places of worship, associations, shops, cafes, lawyers, doctors, and other services. This is linked to families being reunited; the longer the original migrants stay, the more likely they are to bring their partners and children in, or to start new families. People begin to see their life as being based in the new country. This is particularly true of migrants' children: once they go to school in the new country, learn the language and make friends, it becomes more and more difficult for the parents to return to their homeland.

7 While the links between immigrant community and area of origin may sometimes be weakened, they are more likely to continue over generations. Family and cultural links remain, and new business links may be developed.

Section Four: Reading Passage II

The Discourse on Globalization

1 The term Globalization is ambiguous. Sometimes it is used simply to describe increased human interactions through travels, studies abroad, dissemination of music, literature, movies and exotic foods, as well as the arrival of the internet. But in present national and international politics, Globalization is first and foremost a term that denotes the radical change that has taken place in international economic relations and politics during the last twenty-five years, promoted by the breakthrough of neo-liberalism. Opening national borders everywhere for the unhindered movement of capital, goods and services, these policies have turned most of the world into one single gigantic market on the premises of transnational corporations. These corporations have denied poor people the right to use such protective measures that the rich countries guarded themselves with during their own industrialization. The global financial crisis which was unleashed in 2008 by reckless speculations in the USA is a telling reminder about other risks inherent in neo-liberalism.

2 The international anti-Globalization movements, which are claiming that another world is possible, are attacking this kind of Globalization. A striking feature of this Globalization is that the process is seemingly automatic. What this means is that it is driven by actions of capitalistic forces, helped by 17.
